19th December 1953] [Sri C. Subramaniam]

engaged in trade union activities. Let them carefully consider how far they can go and where they have got to stop. Even in an agitation they can go only up to a certain extent and beyond that it becomes dangerous and harmful. When it becomes harmful they must stop it.

" Take the case of the tramways. As a result of labour agitation, the tramway company closed their business. It is only because of the attitude taken by the labour union in the initial stages that the tramway company was closed. They did not agree for retrenchment earlier. Later on, they agreed to it, but unfortunately it proved of no avail as the whole affair became dead. We cannot give life to a dead thing. Therefore we are unable to take over the tramway company. This is a striking instance in which labour agitation has given a chance to the management to close down their business and run away. So, in considering these problems, let us not be obsessed with our own politics and our own point of view. Let us take a broader view, a national view which will be in the interests of the entire State. If only we approach these problems in this larger aspect and with this broader outlook, I have absolutely no doubt that the differences between the various parties could be easily bridged and we could have a common programme of action which will be for the prosperity and wellbeing of the State as a whole. Thank you, Sir."
